First, some background. While I am happy with the general practice, I have never made an argument for why this particular form is called "disjunctive syllogism." While I have heard of its existence, I have never seen any arguments for its construction, nor could I find any authoritative reference on the web. Definitions: Disjunctive syllogism: A disjunctive syllogism is a syllogism that is composed of two categorical syllogisms. Matched Cases: A matched case is an argument form that has two instances of a categorical syllogism. Examples: All men eat meat - All men are mortal. All men are mortal - Socrates is a man. All men eat meat. - Socrates is a man. All men are mortal. - All men are mortal. Socrates is a man - All men are mortal.

Question: Is there a logical justification for calling this form a disjunctive syllogism? If so, how is it called? Why is it called this? For instance, let's say we have two premises: All eagles are birds All eagles are immortal If we then want to know whether some eagle (that is, some individual) is immortal or not, we could use one of the following two syllogisms: All eagles are immortal. All eagles are birds. or (eagle is mortal) and (eagle is immortal). (eagle is immortal). So, we have at least two premises, but they are dis
