The .The ABC's three broadcaster maternity leave scheme has dramatically increased the number of women participating in the scheme. Key points: A three-year study found the scheme paid more to women who gave birth to their children earlier A three-year study found the scheme paid more to women who gave birth to their children earlier The scheme was originally designed to increase participation rates of Australian women in the workforce The scheme was originally designed to increase participation rates of Australian women in the workforce It paid more to women who gave birth to their child earlier in the year A three-year study by the University of Sydney, the University of Queensland and the Melbourne School of Population and Global Health found the number of working women taking part in the scheme increased substantially after the extension of maternity leave to 34 weeks. The group representing the 19 federal electorates with majority female populations found the payments were more than 10 per cent higher in electorate seats with the highest proportions of women in work. The study, published in the Australian Journal of Public Health, looked at the effect of the scheme on work participation, earnings and the use of leave entitlements from April 2009 to March 2017. More than 60,000 women were enrolled in the scheme at that time. Those who were enrolled at birth increased from 26 per cent in 2009 to a peak of 33 per cent in 2014, before falling slightly to 32 per cent in 2016. Payments to the women at 34 weeks, however, increased from 31 per cent to a high of 46 per cent in 2014 and remained at that level until the extension to 42 weeks after which they increased to 44 per cent in 2017. 'Flexible payments' The study authors attributed the increase to the fact that the payments were only available to women who had given birth in the previous financial year. The mother must be pregnant for the first three months and the period for which the payments are awarded is known as the payment period. At the time the payments were introduced, they were calculated using a formula that adjusted for age, and whether or not the woman was in full-time study or on maternity leave. The payments were also calculated according to whether the women gave birth at the end of the financial year or in the middle of it. The period in which a woman gave birth was known as e79caf774b
